THREE YOUNG MEN

Clough, Gertrude Parker, Barbara Albert Baker of the faint, elusive vels that it ever really smile; John McNeil, whose infectious laughter paved with merriment the short highway of his life; and Henry Pierce who looked with smiliing eyes upon the world and found it good to know.

On this particular spring morning the three young gentlemen had taken upon themselves the task of cleaning out the wine cellar. They had worked faithfully with much good natured banter. Four almost emptied kegs of brandied cherries, had been carried to a nearby field and their contents deposited beneath a Damson plum tree. This was an ancient custom for it was believed the pickled cherries gave size and flavor to the plums.

The three young men scattered the cherries at the base of the tree and this was all they did, for as they commenced to dig the trench in which to bury the fruit, an oriole caroled from an elm top and the flute like notes of a lark sounded in the meadow. Albert, John and Henry were filled too, with the joy of living and spading earth over last year's cherries became distasteful and unpleasant. This was the gypsying time of the year. Only a fleet young horse was needed to make the day complete, and he was easy to obtain. And so in an incredibly short space of time the three young men three spirited steeds rode through the village with the two gray hounds trotting at the bay

It was the growing month of May comes but rarely in a lifetime, and Albert, John and Henry filled only with the pleasure of the moment, lifted their mounts to a gallop and soon were far out on the plains, forgetful of the cherries beneath the flowering plum tree. But if they had given thought to them it would not have mattered very much, for when one is in the springtime of his years, who would turn back to complete an irksome task when the wild apple perfume filled the air and soft May breezes lilted of adventure? Albert, John and Henry galloped on and on, away from care and tasks and even thoughts accusing of a duty left undone.

While the three young men were noon hour came, and school children on their way home to dinner to make the distance shorter, cut across the field and saw the cherries scattered at the plum tree's base. The children tasted one wet, luscious cherry, they tasted two, then discarding all restraint and caution, feasted themselves upon this strange, delicious fruit. Slowly the drowsy wings of stupor folded about them, and helplessly they sank down upon the ground and surrendered to deep and dreamless slumber.

At one o'clock the teacher rang his bell, but to its incessant calling no children hurried down the road. After a wait that brought no tardy pupils, the man of rod and rule started out to find his charges. The schoolhouse stood with open deers upon the highway. Church bells rang to summon aid in grave disaster. Teacher and pupils had disappeared as if the earth had opened and drawn them down into its darkness. Mothers wept, fathers stormed and scolded. Searching parties explored the tangle of the river bank, while others threaded the woods calling each child by
